From at least as early as the 1930s, Italian cinema has used urban or rural settings to convey the moral status of its characters (the immoral femme fatale, the hapless peasant, the urban swindler). With the advent of post-World War II neorealism, “the city” emerged as a character in its own right. Indeed, it would be difficult to imagine the films under consideration in this course (by Antonioni, Pasolini, and Rosi) without taking into account how architecture (or its stark and emphatic lack) informs the cinematic frame. Taking its inspiration from filmmakers and theorists who address how cinema, like architecture, structures vision and belief, this course examines how Antonioni, Pasolini, and Rosi both utilize and theorize the encounter between space and human experience. Themes to include: the southern question, urbanization and industrialization in postwar Italy, globalization and ecology.

Participation: 35%

Regular attendance and active participation are required. Students who make the most of the seminar time by posing thoughtful questions, engaging directly with the texts assigned, and listening attentively to their classmates will receive excellent participation grades.

4 in-class close readings/analyses/responses: 20%

Over the course of the semester, each student will be responsible for two brief (10-15 minute) close readings/analyses and two brief (10-15 minutes) responses to a student presentation. Presenters will select a film frame, sequence, or technique for in-class analysis and discussion that considers the readings for the week (or, alternatively, from weeks past). The goal of this exercise is to hone cinematic close reading skills, and to incite discussion about intersections between film theory and practice. Respondents will listen actively to presentations, and will be asked to engage with the presentation in as detailed a manner as possible, offering questions on the presentation and/or further lines of discussion for the group.

Final paper: 45%

Students will write a 15-page final research paper consisting of a close reading of a film or a film-theoretical essay, drawing from at least one text (film or essay) on the syllabus and relating to at least one of the major topics covered in the course. Students should consult between 3 and 4 secondary sources, and should include a bibliography in MLA format.
